" The present invention relates to an expandable bed rail and more particularly to a bed rail that expands and contracts in accordance with the position of the bed on which it is mounted. One known form of bed rail is comprised of a tube of hard rubber material and it is useful to expand and contract this tube to provide a suitable bed rail when the bed on which it is mounted moves between its extreme positions. In the prior art, the tube for this bed rail has been made somewhat wider than the maximum distance between the bed rails and in the manner of a channel and has been expanded by air pressure to form a parallelogrammic arrangement to provide suitable support for the bed. The difficulty with the expandable bed rail as heretofore constructed is that the force required to expand the bed rail in order to get it to come to the desired shape is in excess of the strength of the materials of which the bed rail is composed and it therefore has a tendency to break during expansion. Accordingly, the present invention is directed to the provision of an expandable bed rail having strength in proportion to its length and width, the bed rail having a stable expansion without damage due to overloading.
