K+ channels have a crucial role in controlling the resting potential and triggering Ca2+ influx in retinal photoreceptors. In cone cells, the Ca(2+)-activated K+ channel (KCa1.1) is deactivated by hyperpolarization, which in turn is due to activation of the transient outward current (I(T)). The desensitization-resistant KCa1.1 (KCa) has been suggested to be the KCa channel mediating the hyperpolarizing response (I(H)) of photoreceptors. We investigated the subcellular and molecular distribution of the KCa channel in mouse cone photoreceptors and its in vivo activation. Patch-clamp recordings from isolated cone cells in retinal slices showed a KCa current with voltage- and time-dependent activation. Patch-clamp recordings from isolated cell bodies of cones in slices revealed a membrane potential-independent KCa current which was activated by depolarization and inhibited by extracellular Ca2+. By immunoblotting with antibodies against the KCa1.1 alpha-subunit, immunofluorescence experiments revealed the presence of immunoreactive KCa1.1 alpha-subunit in the inner and outer segment of photoreceptor cells and in the synapses of bipolar cells. KCa1.1 immunoreactivity was also found in the inner segment of horizontal cells
