“The key to everything we do at EA is to be better than you were last year,” says Steve Levinson, Executive Vice President, FIFA. “Last year, we introduced the engine. This year, with the new CryEngine, and with a new game play model that allows us to build the game to a completely fresh vision, we’ve done something new in the history of the game. We’re ready to play the game.”

FIFA® 22 is a leap forward for the franchise. The new game introduces a number of new innovations to bring realism and authenticity to a new generation of football games. Several elements of game play are enhanced for the next generation of FIFA gameplay, including the new engine, a new locomotion system, a new on-ball AI, and a new real-time match engine. Players are now on the ball more and perform more ball-based actions more realistically, delivering an authentic and emotionally-driven game experience for the player. The game also features all-new crowds, with more than double the number of stadiums compared to the previous game in the series, and the ability to control the crowd for some matches. The game's new in-game engine takes visual fidelity to a new level, using true next generation graphics and rendering technology to bring more realistic environments, players and stadiums to life. Pentagon delays deliveries of lunar landers By Tiffany Hsu Dec. 3, 2018 The Pentagon's Space Test Program last week ordered the indefinite delay of the first test flights of NASA's Orion and SpaceX's Dragon capsules after the companies failed to deliver the lunar landers they were contracted to build. The delay means that NASA may not begin testing the key components for astronauts to reach the surface of the moon until the mid-2020s, and that the government won't be ready to help the next wave of commercial companies build their own robotic landers before the 2030s. Two NASA contractors had a hand in the lunar lander project: Lockheed Martin Space Systems in Denver and the Sierra Nevada Corporation's Space Systems in El Segundo, California.
