The present invention relates to a gas phase sensor for an exhaust gas from an internal combustion engine. Vehicle exhaust gas from an internal combustion engine contains harmful substances such as hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxide in the exhaust gas of the internal combustion engine. There is a need to identify the harmful substances in the exhaust gas to satisfy the requirements in the exhaust gas of the internal combustion engine. A gas phase sensor is one of the apparatuses for detecting harmful substance. The gas phase sensor includes a detecting element to detect the harmful substance in the exhaust gas and an electric circuit to apply an electric voltage to the detecting element and measure the value of an electric current flowing through the detecting element to detect the harmful substance. The detecting element is constructed of a metal oxide semiconductor of ZnO, SnO₂, TiO₂, WO₃ or the like. Incidentally, the harmful substances as determined by the gas phase sensor contain the remaining amount of hydrocarbon, combustion deposits and a soot suspension in the exhaust gas.

The combustion deposits are thickened to deposit on the detecting element during a long operation of the internal combustion engine. The combustion deposits are composed of carbides containing carbon, oxides of zirconium and oxides of iron. The object of the deposit is to prevent an electric current from passing through the detecting element. To remove the combustion deposits, a heater for cleaning is provided in the gas phase sensor. The heater applies heat energy to the detecting element to vaporize the combustion deposits and remove the same from the detecting element. Since the combustion deposits contain impurities, a construction is provided in which cleaning vapor generated by applying heat energy to the combustion deposits flows into a heater chamber in the gas phase sensor via a non-metallic material such as quartz (silicon) (JP-A-5-2714
