Making adjustments Photoshop enables you to make adjustments to your image. An adjustment tool is a tool that lets you adjust the brightness or color of an image. By using this tool, you can adjust an image so that it looks better, without actually changing the image itself. Adjustments can be made in many ways, including * Luminance: Your camera usually controls the amount of brightness or the luminance of your images. Adjustments to this amount of brightness can be made using the luminance slider that you can access using the Adjustments panel (refer to Figure 5-3). * Color: The color adjustment tool enables you to change the colors of the image. You can change the color using sliders that change the red, green, and blue components of the image. Many different color functions are available, allowing you to select the saturation and hue functions, to mention a few. * Using curves and grids: Curves and grids provide another way to adjust the brightness or color of an image, without changing the image itself. These tools work by providing sliders that you use to adjust the brightness or color of the image. The area you specify is where you change the brightness or color of the image. If you want to change the overall brightness of the image or the overall color of the image, you change the curves to change the brightness or the colors, respectively. Although changing the brightness and color can make your image look better, any change you make to an image can adversely affect how an image looks. Thus, this process should be used sparingly if you want the results to look good. A good technique for using this tool is to first make changes that you think will be appropriate and then adjust your changes until you are satisfied with the outcome. Figure 5-3: Photoshop has a variety of ways to make changes to an image.

Read this: Metro Manila goes to sleep as flooding worsens MANILA, Philippines – River levels are steadily rising in Metro Manila, days after its worst storm in years hit the region, and the danger of a looming flood has now increased, according to authorities, as TV images show widespread flooding in the capital. At least six people have been killed since Typhoon Bopha passed south of the capital Friday, around 3.30am, following a storm that spread rainfall and rain water to more than 80 percent of the Philippine Islands. Last weekend's storm, the equivalent of an Asian tropical cyclone, has been attributed to climate change. The Metropolitan Manila Development Authority (MMDA) said parts of the national capital, home to more than 14 million people, flooded. "MMDA can confirm the severe flooding in Metro Manila," the authority said. "Our system is now operating at full capacity with pumps, gritters and boats to the rescue. Facing this unexpected surge of flooding, we deployed personnel and equipment to save lives," the MMDA said in a statement. "We are coordinating with the National Disaster Risk Reduction and Management Council, disaster response team and other government agencies to monitor the situation." Torrential rains pounded other parts of the Philippines on Saturday, and at least three people have been killed in the Visayas region, where Bopha's powerful winds and heavy rains triggered landslides in several areas. More than one million homes and other buildings in at least five provinces have been damaged, according to the government's disaster risk reduction and management council.
