The purpose of this study was to explore the feasibility and safety of using an autogenous soft tissue flap to reconstruct partial facial defect of soft tissue. From January 2002 to December 2004, twenty three patients with large soft tissue defect of the face were treated with autogenous soft tissue flaps. The flaps used included 15 radial free flaps, 4 paramedian free flaps, and 4 neurovascular island flaps. There were 7 males and 16 females, and the age ranged from 8 to 66 years. They were all successfully reconstructed with the soft tissue flaps, which included 12 mild, 9 moderate and 2 severe facial defect. Among them, 11 patients (47.8%) suffered from three-day to two-week complication, such as partial skin necrosis, wound dehiscence and partial muscle necrosis of the face. All of them were cured by symptomatic treatment after debridement, and all flaps survived without obvious sensory defect. The average healing time was 10 weeks, and the follow-up time ranged from 1 to 3 years. All of the patients were satisfied with the appearance and the function of the reconstructed face. The vascularity of the reconstructed face was satisfactory. By using the technique of this study, it is easy to use autogenous soft tissue flaps for large facial defect, and the defects can be reconstructed safely and successfully. Transcript for President Obama gets closer to revealing details about Benghazi raid We know that Hillary Clinton raised questions about the handling of a terrorist attack on our compound in Benghazi, Libya. And his Republican opponent Donald Trump says he'll send more troops to Iraq and expand the war on ISIS if he becomes president. Our panel is here. The president says the president calls it what it is. A terrorist attack. What do you make of that response to make that claim? I think that the Obama administration was angry that they were on the defensive. When they should have been on offense. Look, we have events like this, which are spontaneous, that rise and fall. And then we have planned, large scale attacks like we saw on 9/11 and we saw in Benghazi
